THE OPEN GAME.

The Captain of Yale's First Eleven Writes Favoring More Open Play.

To the Editor of the Yale News:

For several years there has been a growing desire for more open play in the game of football. This has found expression in many ways, the latest of which is the suggestion to take up the English Rugby game as a kind of side recreation and exercise for those not on the regular teams. Our present game has been developed all to the massing of the men upon the center at the sacrifice of nearly all of the open play, which was once its most important and attractive feature, and by giving an exaggerated importance to the scrimmage and the play evolved therefrom has greatly increased the personal contact of the individual members of the opposing sides. This has subjected the game to much criticism, some of which is very just on account of the heavy work and many injuries resulting and has made weight and exceptional strength such necessary qualifications in the players that the great majority have been disqualified from taking part. But to change to a radically different game would be at the loss of all the work and experience of years. And even for those not on the University team to take up entirely new rules and methods of play would but lead to confusion and misunderstanding among players who must from time to time fill up the vacancies occurring on the team. Furthermore, the English Rugby game is weakest in that very particular, which is most open to criticism in our own.

And like all other forms of athletics it requires good and careful training to enable the player to accomplish the best results, both for himself personally and for those he represents. In fact training for football was first introduced in the open game. But one of its most important advantages is its comparative freedom from injury to the players. This has sometimes been questioned. The history of the past however, will demonstrate conclusively that it was the exception rather than the rule for a substitute to be called into a game, and there were years when the same members of a team played every game of the season without an injury—an experience not very common of late years.

It is adapted to a much larger number of persons who while not possessing exceptional weight and strength have nevertheless the true football spirit with good endurance and mental and physical activity. This fact would make the open style of play very popular and in a little time would have an advantageous influence upon the present intercollegiate game. It is the desire of all lovers of the game of football to see it develop and improve in the future as it has in the past, and this will be best accomplished by modifying the present game in those particulars only which experience has clearly shown the necessity. But to divide the attention by taking up several totally different kinds of games will but weaken the best efforts of all and result finally in an unstable style of play, varying from year to year according to the prejudices or influences of those in control and we shall retrograde to the condition which existed before 1876 when each year saw the game change to the Associate, American or Rugby rules with such frequency as to preclude any true progress.

Academic Military Company.

Captain Pettit wishes all the members of the Senior Academic Military Company to be at the Armory at 5 P. M. this afternoon. There will be a regular drill.

made and then it went to the half-back or backs for the kick or punt—the principle ever in the mind of the player being not to be caught with the ball in his possession and not to hold it for a down and thus bring on the scrimmage, except in an extreme emergency.

In the scrimmage when the ball was snapped back the player receiving it instead of attempting to make any advance by means of the scrimmage or other mass plays, passed it to one side or the other, according to previous direction as far out to the open as possible to those of his side awaiting it or he passed it to the rear for a kick or punt. Thus scattering the scrimmage at once and carrying out the general principle of open play.

The open play demands great agility and fast running, accurate passing and catching and good kicking and punting, and at all times the greatest skill and strategy. The victory is won by the players' ability to out-maneuvre his opponents and his quickness in execution rather than by "combined pushing and massive assaults."

And like all other forms of athletics it requires good and careful training to enable the player to accomplish the best results, both for himself personally and for those he represents. In fact training for football was first introduced in the open game. But one of its most important advantages is its comparative freedom from injury to the players. This has sometimes been questioned. The history of the past however, will demonstrate conclusively that it was the exception rather than the rule for a substitute to be called into a game, and there were years when the same members of a team played every game of the season without an injury—an experience not very common of late years.

The Courant Prizes.

The attention of those men trying for editorial positions on the Courant is called to the fact that the prizes offered by the present board, will be awarded in the March number. Due allowance has been made for '99 men, who have had but six months in which to work, while those from '98 and '97 have had nine months. As there only remains about a month more before the award, it is hoped that the competition will be especially good during this time.

The Hon. Robert D. Benedict, LL.D., of New York City, will read a paper entitled, "A Story of the Star Chamber and its Downfall," at the meeting of the New Haven Colony Historical Society, 144 Grove Street, next Monday evening at 8 o'clock. All Yale men are invited.

THE INDIVIDUAL'S OPPORTUNITY.

The period of the college year upon which we are now entering is the one most fitted for hard, conscientious work of a pleasant character. The football season, the dull cramming for examinations, the excitement of the Prom. festivities are all over, and for some ten weeks there will be nothing of an especially engrossing character to draw us away from our books, our lectures and our good, true, broadening friendships—the three things from which it seems to us that we should get most in our college days.

It is strange but true that in freshman, and, to some extent in sophomore year, men are apt to look down upon the hard student. He is called a "dig" or a "grind," when in nine cases out of ten the expression is most inappropriate. The fact is that as men go on in their college course they appreciate real scholarship more and more, and there is hardly a man of low stand at graduation who does not look with an envious eye at a Phi Beta Kappa Key. And well he may, for there are few college honors which means so much in the outside world and give the possessor so much satisfaction from the consciousness of having wisely passed his undergraduate life. Our point then is that we are now beginning the pre-eminently mental-work period of the year, and we shall never cease to regret it if we do not make the most of all the intellectual opportunities which the University affords us. Every Yale man has within reach a great library, admirable curriculum opportunities, lectures by eminent men in all fields of knowledge, concerts, collections of paintings—and almost all the other possible storehouses of a liberal education. The question then for every man to answer is, Shall I make the most of these intellectual opportunities in the next few months, or shall I neglect them one and all for things frivolous and useless, if not positively harmful? There is another source mentioned above by which this term should be made helpful and memorable. We refer to the friendships that may be formed here. No greater privilege is offered at Yale than this—there is no source of more pleasure and profit, to ourselves and others, in developing mind and heart and soul.

We ask men to try to so portion out their time that neither of these two great classes of opportunities for development of knowledge, culture and broadmindedness be carelessly passed over. Earnest work in connection with the curriculum and its supplementary privileges, and much time devoted to improving our friendships, are things of almost equal importance which no one can afford to neglect.
